Copyright © 2021, InfoSpace Holdings, LLC, a System1 Company tried to come to me twice before he actually said the words. I'm so, Ashley, when? I didn't mean to be like this. I'm so sorry, I'm so sorry I circled his back and spoke softly, and I'm sorry. This must be very difficult for you. I was serious. It was clear that his life was about to become much more complicated than mine. But as my focus, I had no idea what life would look like without him. There was no one I trusted to take care of me more than he did. As I lay crying in my arms, what she saw in me seemed less important than it took me six years to see her. I fell in my first year of college after I left. We stopped talking for a while. Then, my grandmother was diagnosed with breast cancer. He said it over the phone. Call Brett and tell him. I'm sure you're not very good, but he's almost family. Should. When I told her, I couldn't stop crying, and she couldn't. We didn't catch the past apologies and tears. Whatever happened during radio silence, he was going to stay there. In the winter, I tried to find someone else to tell me what to think of my body, but I couldn't. I spent christmas vacation with grandma. He bought me a Kodak digital camera. Brett took a picture. Great pictures. A photo he took won him a college scholarship. The photography teacher once said that your boyfriend is a real artist. Whenever he wants to take a picture, let him go. He didn't have to worry. The pictures he took were the only pictures I liked. I'd always loved taking pictures of my family and friends, but I'd be so isolated, I was only interested in taking pictures of myself. Brett taught me a few things about photography, the rule of a third and other things. But he hardly ever painted a self-portrait. I was his main subject, and now I wanted to be my own. I started taking pictures of myself. I felt free to pose in such a way that if the pictures were for public consumption I wouldn't be. I posed like gorgeous, in clothes I no longer wear outside, and finally, naked, posing for myself. After uploading the photos to my computer for a closer look, I noticed something. I had seen where it looked mediocre - a woman unworthy of the desired - was actually quite an attractive girl. My skin was clear and smooth, my breasts were plump and cute, and even my cracks looked like an artist drew on my hips and my hips. I couldn't stop looking at the photos. The stomach, which I thought had gone too far, looked soft and begged to caress. Before long, I became obsessed. I began taking more nude photos of myself playing with lighting, being half-clothed, and even writing things on my body. I pored over the pictures using editing software to change tints, highlighting, and shadows. Over time, I fell in love with my body. I loved it the way it always wanted to be loved: brutally and tenderly. I didn't like the way I looked every day, but I loved myself in general. And as I became more comfortable, I became comfortable A lot. Comfortable enough to visit each other, talking about dating. Two years after we broke up, I went out as bisexual to my ex-boyfriend and best friend Brett. He threw his head back and laughed. Knew! I blushed and hid my face behind my palms. He grabbed my wrists and separated them. You can't hide from me. I can see you. Last Updated January 24, 2021. Do you say yes so often that you no longer feel your own needs are being met? You want to know how you can say no to people? For years, a number of people were pleased. Known as someone who stands out, I gladly want to save time, especially when it comes to volunteering for certain reasons. I proudly carried this role in elementary school, university, even law school. For years, I thought saying no means I'm going to disappoint a good friend or someone I respect. But somewhere I noticed that I wasn't fully living my life. Instead, I seem to have created a program that is a strange combination of meeting other people's expectations, I've thought about what I should do, and some of the things I actually want to do. I had a full schedule that left me overwhelmed and unfulfilled. It took me a long time, but I learned the art of saying no. Saying no meant that I no longer fully responded to everyone's needs and could make more room for what I really wanted to do. Instead of being stuck too much, I chose to go after what really mattered. When that happened, I was much happier. Guess what? I didn't disappoint anyone. It's important to say no. Instead of seeing (and not doing) everything you can or should do, you start looking at how to say yes to what matters. In other words, you're not just reacting to what life throws at you. You're looking for opportunities to get you where you want to be. Successful people aren't afraid to say no. Oprah Winfrey, considered one of the most successful women in the world, admitted it was much later when she learned to say no. Even after having international notch, he felt he had to say yes to almost everything. Saying no also helps you manage your time better. Warren Buffett sees no need for his success. He said: The difference between successful people and really successful people is that really successful people say no to almost everything. I no made part of my toolbox. I drove more than my own success, focusing on less things and doing well. No wonder many of us find it hard to say no. From an early age, we were conditioned to say yes. We probably said yes a hundred times to graduate high school and get into college. We said yes to get a job, get promoted, find love, and then we said yes to stay in a relationship again. We said yes to find and keep friends. Yes Because when we help someone, we feel good. Feel. This may seem like the right thing to do, because we think it's the key to success, and because desire can come from someone who's hard to resist. And that's not all. The pressure to say yes doesn't just come from others. We put too much pressure on ourselves. At work we say yes because we compare ourselves to others who seem to be doing more than we are. We say yes outside of work because we feel bad that we are not trying hard enough to spend time with family or friends. The message is, wherever we turn, almost always, you may actually be doing more. The result? When people asked us for our time, we were conditioned to say yes. How can you say no without feeling guilty? It's no small thing to decide to add your no word to your toolbox. Maybe you're already saying no, but not as much as you'd like. Maybe you have an instinct that if you learn the art of charity, you can finally create more time for the things you care about. But let's be honest, using the word no doesn't come easy for a lot of people. Thumbs 3 Rules to Say No1. You need to get out of your comfort zone Let's face it. It's hard to say no. Setting boundaries around time, especially if I haven't done much in the past, you will feel strange. Your comfort zone is yes, so it's time to challenge that and get out of it. If you need help getting out of the comfort zone, see this article. 2. If you are the Air Traffic Controller of your time When you want to know how to say no, remember that you are the only one who understands the demands of your time. Think about it: who else knows all the demands in your life? Nobody. You're the only one at the heart of all these requests. You're the only one who understands when you get it. 3. Saying No Means Saying Yes to Something Important When we decide not to do something, it means that we can say yes to something else that we care more about. You have a unique opportunity to decide how to spend your precious time. 6 Ways No Begins by Saying that little word no can transform into your life. Turning things around means you can open the door to things that really matter. Here are some basic tips for learning the art of no: One of the biggest challenges of saying check in no with The 1st Must Meter is the feeling of necessity. Do you think you have a responsibility to say yes and worry that saying no will reflect badly on you? Ask yourself if you really have a duty to say yes. Check your assumptions or beliefs about whether you have the responsibility of saying yes. Turn it around and ask yourself what task you owe yourself instead. 2. Is there any fear of missing (FOMO)? FOMO can follow us in many ways. We volunteer at work because we're afraid we're not going to move forward. In our personal lives, thanks to fomo, we agree to join the crowd, even if we don't have fun. Log in to yourself. Has Is it because of FOMO or because you really want to say yes? Most of the time, pursuing fear doesn't make us feel any better. 3. Guess What It Means to Say No Do you have any fear of the reaction you will get if you say no? Most of the time we say yes because we worry about how others will react or the consequences. We may fear disappointing others or that we will lose their respect. We often forget how much we let ourselves down along the way. Keep in mind that saying no may be exactly what it takes to send the message that you have limited time. In the following tips, you will see how kindly and lovingly communicating no. Initially you can disappoint someone, but drawing a line can bring you the freedom you need, so you can freely give yourself away whenever you really want. And it will usually help others respect you and your limits more, not less. 4. When the request comes, sometimes sit down, we moment, we instinctively agree. The request might make sense at first. Or we've generally said yes to that request in the past. Give yourself some time to think about whether you really have time or can function properly. You can decide the best option is to say no. There's no harm in giving yourself time to decide. 5. Communicates Your No with Transparency and Kindness When you're ready to say no to someone, make your decision clear. The message can be open and honest to make sure that the recipient's reasons are related to your limited time. Resist all requests not to respond or communicate. But I don't feel like I have to give you a long account of why you said no. Clear communication with a brief explanation is all that is required. I found it helpful to tell people that I have many demands and that I should pay attention to how I dedit my time. Sometimes they really came to me and will say thank you to check again if the opportunity ad a time ad. 6. Consider How to Use a Modified No If you are under pressure to say yes but want to say no, you might consider dropping a yes yes but ... as this will give you an opportunity to condition the deal for what is best for you. Sometimes, the situation may be to do the task, but not in the desired time frame at the beginning. Or maybe you can do some of what you want. Last Thoughts Starting right now, you can change how you can respond to your time requests. When the request arrives, remove yourself from an autopilot that you can normally say yes to. Use the request as a way to draw a healthy boundary around your time. Pay particular attention to your specific demands on yourself. Now, you're going to have to. Say no to a friend who continues to enjoy his good intentions. Or draw the line with a workaholic colleague and you will complete the project, but all week work to complete. You're going to find a lot for yourself. You'll find it. NoFeatured photo credit count more tips on how: Chris Ainsworth unsplash.com unsplash.com
